ST.000 FEAST NAPLES' BIG DAY; PATRON OF CITY

Good and Bad Join in Merry-making; History Order by Franciscan Fathers

NAPLES, Italy, Aug. 31.—No festival in Naples, Italy, national or municipal can compare in point of universality or enthusiasm with the Feast Day of St. Januarius. It is the patron of the city, the Penates of the home, the idol and center of the emotional and intermediary worship of every Neapolitan. It is alike a festival for the good and bad. In it the pious see an indication of divine favor; the merchant finds proof of prosperity or misfortune, and the evil-doer reads insecurity or peace of conscience for another year. And it all depends upon the feast whether the miracles are true or not. A learned Franciscan Father has furnished the following accounts of Naples' Big Day:

"We had risen early on the morning of September 19 to see the sun rise over Mount Vesuvius, and at the same time to be in readiness for an early departure for the Cathedral. For the 19th is the day of the semi-annual miracle—the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius and all Naples is awake early on that day. As only the prompt can gain admittance to the church, unless you beat yourself an army of pious old men and women will have preceded you.

It was not seven o'clock when we descended into the street, and even in holy Naples an extra bustle and activity were evident. True the shops and places of business were closed, but all over the streets there was a special and somewhat ingenious method of making money without displeasing the Saint. Here on the corner is an old man carrying a sack, containing busts of St. Januarius in cope and mitre. They are only two sold each, and as he advertises his presence he asks you what better ricordo of Naples could the stranger have or what surer entrance into the affections of the Saint for the Neapolitan? As you stand to inspect the rude sculpture another passes you with pictures and medals bearing the effigy of the man of God. Across the way is a stand where a hundred different articles with the face and form of Januarius stamped upon them are sold at lowest prices. And they all do a thriving business for Neapolitans are good natured today and everyone must carry home some reminder of the feast.

As you approach the Cathedral you will be persuaded that it is a market place, for there before you on the high steps of the Duomo are congregated half a dozen specimens of every variety of business we had seen along the way. And how they shout their wares and try to press them upon you! But you have only to raise your finger in the peculiar Italian way and they will make room for you and allow you to ascend to the door of the Cathedral. By the extreme kindness of the saint we were allowed to enter the sanctuary of the chapel where the relic is kept—one would say guarded, of which one key is retained by the Cardinal Archbishop, another is given to the acting mayor of Naples, and the third is in possession of some prominent citizen, layman or ecclesiastic.

"Just here a line of history may not be out of place. Januarius was the bishop of Benevento—a town near Naples—at the opening of the fourth century. In the time of persecution he was seized by the governor of the province and cast into prison. Shortly afterwards with many companions he was exposed to the wild beasts in the immense amphitheatre of Pozzuoli. But God preserving his servants from such a death they were immediately condemned to be beheaded. Their relics were safely guarded by the pious Christians and the body of Januarius was placed in the Cathedral of Naples.

As was customary in those days of faith, some religious person zealously collected the blood. That same blood can be seen in the treasury of the Cathedral today. It is contained in two small vials, is of a dark brown appearance, and very dry and hard. But twice a year, in September and May, the first day of the execution and the second the translation of the relics from Pozzuoli—when the blood is brought within sight of the head of the martyr it melts gradually and becomes a flowing liquid.

We have not long to wait before a Monsignor, accompanied by several bishops appeared upon the altar. The Monsignor held the reliquary turning it upside down from time to time to see if any liquefaction had taken place. All the while the clergy and the people were reciting litanies and beseeching St. Januarius to once more bestow upon Naples this mark of his favor. The chapel was crowded and the air warm and suffocating. Old men and old women shouted in harsh notes at the top of their voices putting all faith and earnestness in their petitions.

The people jostled one another in their efforts to be near the altar. Through faith or curiosity everyone was anxious to see the miracle. Amid the excited throng there was a general hush all at once silence prevailed. A drop—more! a flow of liquid was remarked within the vial. In an instant a tremendous cheer filled the Cathedral. In spite of itself every voice in that congregation gave utterance to an exclamation of wonder or thanksgiving. At the same time from the top of the Duomo a signal was given. Cannons boomed from St. Elmo, the
